Air conditioning systems that have recently been proposed or which have previously been offered for sale are often subjected to testing and operating during which refrigerant level is monitored. Such monitoring is usually done in an attempt to diagnose a leak in the system. All air conditioning systems, refrigerant compressors or oil compressors, sometimes provide two or more analog signal outputs which represent an operational condition of the system. For example, the output of an oil compressor may indicate a peak oil pressure of the compressor or the position of a needle on a pressure gauge. Refrigerant is usually expressed in a binary system in which a "0" indicates that the amount of refrigerant in the system is below some predetermined threshold and the “1” indicates that the amount of refrigerant in the system is above the predetermined threshold. By monitoring the output of an air conditioning system, it may be determined whether the refrigerant level is below the predetermined threshold and if it is determined that the refrigerant level is above the predetermined threshold, it may be suspected that a leak is present. Because the accuracy of the analog signal outputs from an air conditioning system or other device is generally not the same as the accuracy of the output of a refrigerant gauge, the analog signals may be calibrated. The calibrating of the analog signal outputs may be done with a calibrated manometer. In many compressors, air conditioning systems, oil compressors and the like, an output of the compressor may be provided as a digital representation of a percentage of the volumetric capacity of the compressor. For example, in an air conditioning system, the output of the compressor is provided as a percentage of the volum
