Q: Semiconductor Chemistry I am studying the chemistry of semiconductors such as Silicon and Gallium Arsenide for the semiconductor industry. I have seen a few energy band diagrams of certain semiconductors. I will not list them here, as they seem to be fairly self explanatory. But they mainly show the conduction and valence bands in the form of a parabola and the conduction and valence band edges are labelled as E_c and E_v respectively. My question is this, am I correct in my understanding? The general idea is this: The conduction band edges are at the minima of the parabolas. The valence band edges are at the maxima of the parabolas. The difference between E_c and E_v is the band gap and is expressed as the energy between the conduction band and the valence band. If anyone would like to see a link to an energy band diagram of Gallium Arsenide, please post it. A: The picture you are looking at are band diagrams of a semiconductor. In semiconductors, the electronic band structure is a result of the separation (chemical bond) between the d and p electronic states of the atoms which constitute the semiconductor. In the band diagram above, the horizontal axis is the energy of the states, with positive energy above the Fermi level. The vertical axis is the momentum of the electron, and is parallel to the direction of the force at the atoms, illustrated by arrows. The horizontal line, horizontal bars and the line through the center of each orbitals are guides to the eye. The conduction band is a region of the semiconductor with an electron density sufficiently high that the electronic states in this region can be considered to be conduction band electrons. The valence band is a region of the semiconductor with an electron density sufficiently low that the electronic states in this region can be considered to be valence band holes. The band gap is the energy difference between the conduction band edge and the
